The IRSL in 1986-87 was the last time a professional Roller Derby league was on mainstream television when the four team league had a deal with ESPN. It was also the first time that the skaters names were on the back of the jerseys thus, it really felt as if Roller Derby had finally made the leap into the ranks of major league sports. The first season was a great success with packed arenas on both coasts and for the second season an expansion franchise was announced for Canada where the Northern Knights were meant to compete in home games in Ontario and Quebec. But unfortunately, the promoter and the skaters could not agree on the skating style going forward (the promoter wanted to move towards more wrestling-style Roller Games whereas the skaters, most of which had come through the ranks of the original Roller Derby (Jerry Seltzer's one) wanted to retain the existing competitive skating. As a result of the infighting ESPN cancelled the contract and the league was gone for good.
